TRADITIONAL NATIVE CULTURE AND SPIRITUALITY: A WAY OF LIFE THAT GOVERNS US

By Bessie Mainville

Bessie Mainville is an Ojibwe Traditional Elder who resides on Couchiching First Nation. Bessie was born in Manitou Rapids. When her mother died at an early age, Bessie was left with her aunts to raise and take care of her. She experienced pure love from her aunts while being raised in two households. At the age of 18 she was united in marriage with Elmer Mainville and then moved to the community of Couchiching. Being new to the community allowed her to make many new friends, but it was the older ladies of the community that became the closest. Later in life when her children were all gone to school she would join the Catholic Women’s League and visit with these ladies on a daily basis. She felt very blessed not only to have a big family with lots of children, grand children and great grand children, but to have a mother and father in law who spoke the Ojibwe language fluently. Feasting and gatherings in both communities is very important to Bessie, and she participates in both spring and fall.

RECONCILIATION AND THIRD-PARTY INTERESTS: TSILHQOT’IN NATION V. BRITISH COLUMBIA

By Kent McNeil

The manner in which conflicts between Aboriginal title to land and private third-party interests should be dealt with is a major issue in Canadian law and policy. The matter came up at trial in Tsilhqot’in Nation v. British Columbia, and again was left unresolved. However, Justice Vickers did acknowledge the vital importance of the issue and the need to reconcile these conflicting interests through honourable negotiations. While admitting that a courtroom is not the appropriate forum for achieving reconciliation, he provided detailed analysis of the applicable legal principles and insights into the public policy considerations that should guide the negotiations.

This article examines these aspects of Justice Vickers’ judgment and suggests more specific ways in which Aboriginal title and thirdparty interests might be reconciled through the process of negotiation. It proposes a context-based approach that seeks to redress the historical injustice of the wrongful taking of Aboriginal lands, without disregarding the current interests of innocent third parties. The monetary costs of reconciliation, it is argued, should be borne by the real wrongdoers, namely the provincial and Canadian governments.
WHOSE “DISTINCTIVE CULTURE”? ABORIGINAL FEMINISM AND R. v. VAN DER PEEt

By Emily Luther

Aboriginal women have been historically disadvantaged through oppression by both the Canadian state and their own communities. While feminism has often been dismissed as a tool for Aboriginal women, a theoretical and activist movement known as Aboriginal feminism has slowly been gaining ground. Its tenets include drawing inspiration from non-Aboriginal forms of feminism; analyzing colonialism and patriarchy together; evaluating Aboriginal traditions on their merits—that is to say, on whether the way they are currently practiced benefits or harms women; and being willing to ally with the Canadian state and non-Aboriginal feminists in order to promote the interests of Aboriginal women. This paper draws on Aboriginal feminist ideas and applies them to a leading Aboriginal rights case, R. v. Van der Peet, in which an Aboriginal right is defined as a practice or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the group claiming the right. This analysis demonstrates that the test set out in Van der Peet is inconsistent with Aboriginal feminist doctrine and that it tends to encourage results that Aboriginal feminists warn against. In particular, it tends to elevate to rights only those practices or traditions that benefit Aboriginal men over women; it encourages the rigid idealization of pre-contact practices; and finally, it indirectly reinforces internal violence and oppression. Therefore, an alternative test is needed, through which traditions that enrich women’s roles are celebrated and revived, and ones that oppress women are rejected.

FACT, NARRATIVE, AND THE JUDICIAL USES OF HISTORY: DELGAMUUtKW AND BEYOND

By Eric H. Reiter

This article examines how judges’ use of history serves to construct and reinforce particular views of the past, of the legal order, and of the relationship between the two. Through an analysis of Delgamuuukw v. British Columbia and more recent Aboriginal title and rights cases, it traces the process through which judges select facts and turn them into narratives, and then authorize those narratives into new “facts” through the act of judgment. This process of narrative construction is inherently political, and rests on culturally specific assumptions about the nature of time and historical significance. By forcing litigants—particularly Aboriginal litigants—to fit their claims and their history into the predominant narrative, history as wielded by judges represents a powerful force for the creation and preservation of orthodoxy that severely limits the possibilities for dialogue and pluralism in law.

R. v. KAPP: A CASE OF UNFULFILLED POTENTIAL

By Dominique Nouvet

The Supreme Court of Canada’s judgment in R. v. Kapp was a much anticipated decision for followers of equality and Aboriginal rights jurisprudence alike. The following commentary focuses on the Aboriginal rights implications of Kapp.
TIDES OF HISTORY AND JURISPRUDENTIAL GULFS: NATIVE TITLE PROOF AND THE NOONGAR WESTERN AUSTRALIA CLAIM

By Dr Simon Young

Recent native title litigation in Australia, over the important Noongar claim to areas in the south west of the country, highlight some persistent difficulties and troubling trends in Australian native title law. The Federal Court trial and appeal decisions (of 2006 and 2008 respectively) provide telling confirmation that the Australian approach to proof of native title entitlement is a mix of foundational ambiguity, theoretical complexity, moral controversy and practical uncertainty. This article traces the development of the relevant principles in Australian law, up to and including the dissonant Noongar decisions, and advances some potential doctrinal clarifications. It also seeks to underline the risk that prolonged litigation in this field can be an expensive and unhelpful distraction from meaningful progress.
